One of the Jones brothers, inventor of a successful cough drop, waits at the station for his country niece Utilla. The girl, having missed a train, comes gliding into the station, pumping a hand car. She cheerfully pays a charge for using the railway tracks and kicks a porter in the shins because he tries to carry her satchels.

Uncle embraces several children and has a tough time of it before Utilla throws her arms around his neck, after having picked him out by consulting a photograph. He takes her home in his limousine. She has a hot time slipping and sliding on the polished parlor floor.

A maid tries to get her out of her rustic garb, but Utilla insists on wearing her heavy underwear when she meets a number of her uncle's gentlemen friends. Uncle leaves after the dinner and warns her about his secret formula.

The three Smythe brothers enter, each wearing a long beard. With the aid of the watchman, she traps them in the basement; then the two trap her uncle's party on their return, thinking that the prisoners have escaped.

When matters are adjusted, the would-be thieves are allowed to come up and Utilla accidentally steps on the trap-door and slides to the basement. The youngest member of the visitors jumps after her.
